A Photographer's Wilderness

Etosha National Park is one of Africa's great wildlife destinations — a vast, dramatic landscape where wildlife, light and open space combine to create exceptional photographic opportunities.

At the heart of Etosha lies the enormous Etosha Pan, a shimmering salt pan stretching across the landscape and giving the park its unmistakable character. Surrounding it are open plains, woodland and natural and permanent waterholes that attract an extraordinary variety of wildlife.

For photographers, Etosha offers something very special. Its open terrain, uncluttered backgrounds and concentration of animals around the waterholes provide opportunities to capture powerful images in an environment unlike anywhere else in Africa.

PHOTOGRAPHY IN ETOSHA

Made for Wildlife Photography

Etosha's landscape provides photographers with an opportunity to create images that are very different from those typically associated with an African safari.

The open environment allows wildlife to be photographed against clean, simple backgrounds, while the pale earth and expansive skies provide a distinctive setting for both colour and monochrome photography.

Waterholes create opportunities for behaviour, interaction and action — from elephants arriving to drink to predators watching herds from a distance.

There is also time to look beyond traditional portraits.

Dust, silhouettes, reflections, backlighting and the immense Etosha landscape can all become part of the story.

Whether you are photographing a lone elephant crossing an open plain, a black rhino approaching a waterhole or a lion resting in the afternoon light, Etosha encourages you to think about both the animal and the environment around it.

It is not simply about seeing wildlife — it is about creating images that tell the story of Etosha

THE ETOSHA EXPERIENCE

Where Wildlife Comes to You

Etosha is a place where patience is often rewarded.

Rather than constantly searching for wildlife, some of Etosha's most memorable experiences happen simply by positioning yourself at a productive waterhole and waiting.

Elephant, zebra, giraffe, wildebeest, springbok and other species gather to drink, often providing opportunities to photograph several species within the same scene.

Etosha is particularly renowned for its elephants and its important population of black rhino, while predators including lion, leopard and cheetah add another dimension to the photographic experience.

The changing light throughout the day transforms the landscape. Early mornings bring soft colours and long shadows, while late-afternoon light can turn Etosha's pale landscape into beautiful shades of gold.

Every waterhole and every drive can produce something completely different.
